

when nature calls?

What to do

Have you ever considered the day-to-day personal sanitation needs of your employees? In other words, what they do when nature calls? We have all been in that uncomfortable situation at one time or another -- having to go with no location in site, then having to make a decision about what to do. The question is, what are the realistic options?

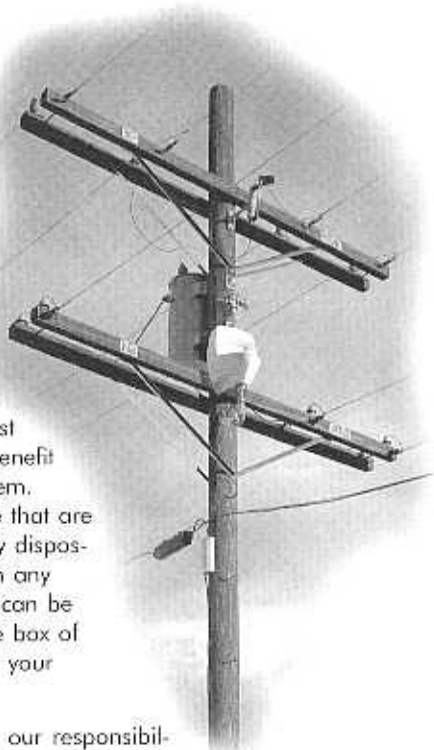

Consider this scenario: You're working on a task that requires your full attention and concentration, you're driving down a busy stretch of road or you're caught in a location that doesn't have washroom facilities close by. What happens when nature calls? Do you drive to the nearest facility, use the great outdoors or try to hold it in? Is there an answer?

This issue is not addressed often enough because it is perceived as being either too trivial or socially inappropriate. In truth, it is an important health and safety consideration... important enough to be legislated for construction projects. Other sectors, it seems, are not up to speed.

Workers are routinely told the importance of being properly hydrated but how much thought has been given to the by-product of our body's need for water! (NOTE: lack of water is the number one trigger of daytime fatigue. As many as 75% of North Americans are chronically dehydrated.)

Hundreds of work hours and thousands of dollars can be lost by employees not having the benefit of an on-site field lavatory system. Yet, there are systems available that are portable, cost effective and fully disposable. Approved for disposal in any trash receptacle, these systems can be small enough to fit in the glove box of your vehicle or in the pocket of your coveralls.

As managers and owners, it is our responsibility to ensure our firms establish a policy that is consistent with positive personal hygiene, our corporation's safety and environmental policies, and the needs of our employees.
